Notes

Push Feel

This entirely-nylon Durock/JWK made tactile switch has a fairly uncommon early-to-mid stroke, medium light tactile bump that just isn't seen amongst the highly tactile offerings of the modern switch scene. While the bump itself is fairly short and with a good amount of weighting behind it, a scratchy, snappy return past the bump as well as a pronounced and extremely light linear pretravel region make an otherwise well-placed tactile bump feel just a tinge strange.

Wobble

Having slightly more N/S stem wobble than E/W stem wobble, these switches would be fairly par for course for standard, non-premium Durock/JWK switch offerings. However, there is a pretty substantial N/S top housing wobble across a batch that necessitates the usage of films.

Sound

While the nylon housings definitely hold their own here and provide a fairly deep, soft sounding bottoming out, the aforementioned tactile bump upstroke scratch and slightly thinner, sort of plasticky sounding topping out really take away from the stock sound performance.

Context

Being the exclusive offering of Loobed Switches, a vendor who sells switches in either stock or hand lubed and filmed formats, the Cotton Candy switches are certainly a good fit. While definitely way too high in the price for performance in either of these formats, the Cotton Candies do well to necessitate the need of the lubing and filming services. Overall availability and longevity of these switches, as well, is uncertain though assumedly for a substantial amount of time due to it seemingly being a flagship product.

Other

I definitely think it is worth awarding some credit to Loobed here for stocking a switch with a relatively uncommon tactility style as a flagship product. While a bit lacking in performance, it allows for a decent beginner-focused variety that has seemingly dwindled over the years.
