Push Feel

Invokekeys' Pea Flower switches are a surprising showing from BSUN insofar that they feature clickbars and a design that was first noted a few years ago in the Glorious Raptor switches. In the hangtime between now and then, though, its evident that these haven't gotten all that much better as the click mechanism, itself feels like a weird cross between sticky and sharp, which gives more a glue-trap like feel to the switch's main attraction than anything else. Otherwise, the switches are at least smooth and somewhat fairly unique in their feeling...

Wobble

In parallel with the Hojicha and Matcha Reserve switches released alongside the Pea Flowers, there is a tiny amount of N/S and E/W direction stem wobble in these switches that does have some room for improvement but is overall quite good for BSUN on the whole.

Sound

Given that clickbar clicky switches are few and far in between, the Pea Flowers have a hell of a competition to stack up against that they simply don't just line up well against. While loud and definitely clicky, they produce a sharp, pin-pricky like sound that feels more like its intentionally trying to annoy people listening to it more than it is defiantly proclaiming a sound profile.

Context

Priced at $0.50 per switch, these switches are still fairly new in the grand scheme of things and will enjoy a fair amount of attention as a result of their siblings and the incredible support from Invokekeys than anything else. That being said, though, these don't pack quite as much performance into their price point than switches like the Hojicha or Matcha Reserves do...

Other

In spite of glitter in switch housings being far from a tired or well tread trend, Invokekeys and BSUN made the gold flake embedded housings of the Pea Flower switches absolutely stunning, and their overall colorway and aesthetic vibe will be memorable for quite some time.
