Push Feel

Marketed more so for their sound profile than their push feeling, it's somewhat clear that this was not their priority in making these switches despite them not necessarily being bad feeling. These switches are relatively smooth with only the finest grain of scratch and have singular, snappy medium heft bottom outs, but something about the combined lighter weighting of these springs with the shortened travel out and abrupt yet not super forceful ending just feels… unbalanced? Perhaps these would have been better with heavier springs out of the gate?

Wobble

While the Rosa Centifolia switches have a moderate amount of stem wobble in the N/S direction, they have significantly less in the E/W direction – all of which is consistent across a batch.

Sound

Along the lines of marketing of a crisp, focused sounding bottom out, the HMX Rosa Centifolia absolutely deliver. These switches have a snappy but not sharp, medium volume tactility that has some depth and body to its sound as to not sound too pointed nor too muted – and the combination of 'strengthened' LY stem material and P7 (50% fiberglass in nylon) bottom housings prove to be a great choice here. The rest of the sound profile, though, is somewhat underwhelming with only minor scratch and truly not much else going on.

Context

Priced at $0.37 per switch, available from a wide range of vendors, and with a decent amount of community attention, the Rosa Centifolia have just about everything you'd want from context aside from planned continuity and/or likelihood that they'll be restocked again. A lot of these newer (2025+) HMX switches have a seemingly planned one-and-done lifespan.

Other

With LED diffusers decorated with patterns growing in popularity throughout 2026, these are among the single best to date to integrate such into their color scheme and design.
