Push Feel

One of the more beautiful aspects of typing on switches in excess of 100 grams of bottom out force, like the Lekker Tikken Heavy Purples, is that bottom out really isn't a concern. These switches, instead, just have a boomerang style linear stroke wherein the user escapes the orbit of topping out to glide down and then back up through a very smooth, well lubed stroke for them to come crashing back to a very firm, almost somewhat snappy topping out.

Wobble

With virtually no E/W direction stem wobble, all of the points deducted here were for moderate N/S direction stem wobble that really shouldn't be a thing at all with springs as heavy as these.

Sound

So many (relatively) medium weight MX style switches try for housing collisions that have as firm, snappy, and deeply solid sounding topping outs as the Lekker Tikken Heavy Purples have. These switches just sound so much more substantial, and in a way that no combination of housing materials, factory lubing, or mold designs would ever accomplish else wise. There is some minor variation among the topping out sound, however.

Context

Even in spite of actually delivering on the promise of these switches, Wooting has gone about them in such comically bad fashion that I should have given them a '0' here. Available only as an add on or freebie to specific Founder's Editions of certain keyboards from them, these and their 80 gf. yellow counterparts were made available… as part of 'Switchy's Spacebar Heist'… in packs of 20… with no availability to the general public and marked not for resale. And all of this for a switch niche not catered to elsewhere in HE switches. What the hell were they thinking?

Other

Despite truly baffling behavior by the Wooting marketing team, I am deeply happy to see a true heavy linear switch be released after several years of nobody attempting such.
