Push Feel

Despite being from something I'd personally enjoy, the Haimu Frost Crystals are definitely interesting tactile switches not for their core mechanism but clearly unintentional side effects of their construction. While they are billed as medium-strong tactile switches with an out-of-the-gate tactile bump that is quite punchy, their main feeling is with the tactile leaves of the switch which almost reverberate around the entirety of the stroke and make the leaf ping feel part of the coherent design, enveloping the rest of the push feeling of the switch. As well, the bottom outs are harsh and snappy feeling to give the ends of the strokes quite a bit of bite.

Wobble

While there is exceedingly little N/S direction stem wobble in these switches, there is a healthy amount of E/W direction give that likely won't bother too many users.

Sound

The pinging of the Haimu Frost Crystal's leaves off of its tactile stem legs doesn't just encompass the push feeling of the switches, but also its sound profile too. More like a deep 'ringing' sound than a high pitched metallic bite, this quite uncommon sound feature is only second place to the snappy, medium pitched, and almost clicky-like sound of the bottom out of these switches. These are definitely a clicky switch fan's tactile switch.

Context

Priced at $0.30 per switch and available solely through Cannonkeys as part of their early 2026 expansion in Haimu offerings, these switches are definitely available and easily accessible though hard to distinguish from the pack and thus uncertain how they will sustain long term. They do have quite a good price per unique performance, however.

Other

It is far from the first time that I've encountered unusual feeling switches, but never before ones that so easily and seamlessly work leaf ping into their overall experience like the Frost Crystals.
